These older films were enhanced by a company called Image Plus, and were released on tape in.As a professional who works for a top NY based law firm, and has studied the creative arts at the School of Visual Arts, i can see a huge gap between the art department and the rest of the law firm. It's a shame that the people who own the law firm are not interested in making the lawyers look good. I work for the "other" law firm. While we don't have an art dept or gallery, I can tell you that not all lawyers (even ones in the big city) do ANYTHING other than write. And if they do, it's probably memos or something like that. I know this firsthand since I've worked for both firms. I'm a junior associate with a mid-level law firm, and I have to admit, I've never thought about my firm's art department. Now that I think about it though, it's pretty unimpressive and not really worth noting. we have a few books in the library, a copy of Rembrandt's The Anatomy Lesson, a few prints and some paintings. The most prominent thing is a really old painting of a dog on a leash which is hanging on the wall outside the conference room. Logged Once a lawyer, always a lawyer, but if you're not a lawyer anymore you can always be a horse's ass. I used to work for a "sister" firm in NYC, but was at their branch out in Phoenix. It was not just attorneys in the law department. There were people from legal aids, attorneys from the in house tech team, the legal secretary from my office...and me. I met some of the lawyers who were on the art committee, and they were really quite the group of people. They were all nice and funny and interesting. Plus, we had a small collection of art in the office that I'm not entirely sure where it came from. I am now working in a large firm in NYC. Although they don't have an art department per se, they do have a couple of lawyers who are very interested in design, and are often consulted by the senior partners on the aesthetics of the firm. They have even sponsored a dinner for a local design agency in the past (paid for by the firm, of course). In the United 82157476af
